

In Dubrovnik, where stone walls meet the waves of the Mediterranean, something unusual is about to happen.

The New Yorker steps from his hotel. Wearing a fusion of early '90s streetwear and Ivy League flair, he heads west, admiring the sights on the latest stop in his European adventure.

The Neapolitan, eagerly anticipating a morning off from a busy business trip, goes south, walking through the streets dressed in a sophisticated yet sporty Italian aesthetic.

The Croatian, descendant of a long line of fishermen, walks east from his flat, the airy fabrics and authentic handstitched details of his clothing marking him as a son of the city.

Three different journeys meet at the same point: a deserted basketball court overlooking the sea.

The game begins. Each of them pushes their skills to the limit, then further, pulling off tricks and shots they'd never normally attempt. The competition is fierce, each at their best because of the other two.

Barriers dissolve and bonds form. They joke and tell stories about their lives, recognizing the difference between them, yet appreciating what they have in common.

As their match ends in a tie, they stand together in the heat, admiring the terracotta roofs of the city.

Three strangers, now friends, united by a shared passion and the universal language of sport.
